LEGAL ASSISTANCE AFTER A DISASTER

The State Bar is a regulatory agency that oversees the legal profession in California, including the licensing of attorneys.

If you have been impacted by a disaster, the State Bar can help you quickly find the legal advice and services you need. You may need help with insurance claims, emergency housing, applying for federal aid, negotiating with contractors, replacing wills and other legal documents, or other issues.

Whatever your situation, the State Bar is here to help.

While the State Bar cannot represent clients or refer you to a particular attorney, the agency can provide reliable information about where to go for legal services after a disaster. If you need a lawyer, the State Bar can connect you with a certified lawyer referral service in your community.

There are many organizations in California dedicated to helping people after a disaster, including those that offer free or low-cost legal help. Many of these groups offer services in multiple languages. The organizations listed in this pamphlet can be a starting point for helping you find the legal services you need.

LEGAL ASSISTANCE FOLLOWING A DISASTER

If you are the survivor of a disaster in California—such as an earthquake, wildfire, or flood—you may need legal assistance.

What kind of legal help is available?

The State Bar can help you find an attorney or legal aid organization in your area who can help you with:

- Securing disaster-related government benefits such as disaster unemployment assistance (DUA).
- Filing claims for life, medical, or property insurance.
- Landlord-tenant negotiations, including price gouging.
- Contracts with service providers, such as construction companies.
- Mortgage and foreclosure issues.
- Worker safety and wage theft issues.

How can I find an attorney?

The State Bar can connect you with a certified lawyer referral service,* legal aid organizations, and other resources. Free and low-cost services are available throughout the state, as well as services in multiple languages.

Where do I go to replace documents?

It may take time to replace the documents you have lost in a disaster. We suggest you start with identity documents, such as your drivers license or identity card. The California Department of Motor Vehicles* can provide replacements. For other documents, the State Bar* provides a list of agencies and information about getting replacements for birth certificates, marriage licenses, and other documents.

In some cases, Local Assistance Centers (LACs) will be set up so that disaster survivors may go to one location for resources, including to replace important documents. For federally declared disasters, LACs transition into Disaster Recovery Centers (DRCs), as part of FEMA, to offer these services. Legal assistance, coordinated through the State Bar and American Bar Association with legal aid organizations, is also often available at LACs and DRCs.

What about federal aid (FEMA)?

Contact the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA)* as soon as possible after a disaster to file for assistance. If your request is denied, you may be eligible to file an appeal. You do not need an attorney to apply for FEMA benefits, but an attorney or a local legal aid organization may advise you about benefits and appeals.

What about help for my business?

The California Secretary of State* has established a team to streamline recovery efforts for businesses affected by disasters. A business attorney may also advise you about any legal issues related to your business operations and recovery.

How can I avoid fraud?

After a disaster, it is important to protect yourself from potential scams. Attorneys and their representatives are prohibited from:

- Soliciting clients at the scene of a disaster or accident, at a hospital, or on the way to a hospital.
- Soliciting clients who are unable to exercise reasonable judgment because of their physical, emotional, or mental state.
- Sending solicitations by mail unless they are clearly labeled as an advertisement.
- Promising a particular outcome from legal representation.

For more information about how to avoid fraud, and how to report fraud or other attorney misconduct, contact the State Bar.
